Winter carnival marks K-State's 150th birthday

Jakki Thompson staff writer

This year marks K-State's 150th, and one of the ways that campus leaders have decided to celebrate is the Winter Expo and Activities Carnival, hosted by the Union Program Council in the K-State Student Union on Thursday night.

We were trying to go with the sesquicentennial theme for our winter activities carnival," said Kaitlin Shea, community co-chair for UPC and senior in public relations. "We use this as a way for early promotion for our other events this semester, as well as tie it into the events of the campus as a whole for K-State's sesquicen-

As a part of the birthday party theme, UPC decorated the K-State Student Union Courtyard with banners, streamers and balloons. UPC also brought in attractions and organized activities for students to enjoy, like a photo booth, spray-on tattoos, free massages and a balloon man. But the treat that everyone seemed to enjoy was the mass of cupcakes given away to celebrate K-State's "birth-

There are a lot of students and student organizations here," said Kyle Reynolds, community cochair of UPC and senior in public relations. "We had a total of 750 cupcakes when this event started. They were probably all gone within the first hour of the event."

Reynolds said one of the biggest challenges the community committee of UPC faced with this event was the five-week break between the fall 2012 and spring 2013 semesters. He said the committee had to complete all of the planning for the expo before finals week of the fall semester in order for the event to succeed. Committee members scattered across Kansas during the break, so they had to make sure the planning and execution of the event were spot-on.

The K-State track and field team kickstarted the weekend's sporting events Thursday when the Wildcats traveled to Ames, Iowa, to participate in the Bill Bergan Invitational.

The three-day meet is large and competitive, pitting K-State's No. 16-ranked men against No. 8 Minnesota, No. 10 Wisconsin and No. 24 University of Texas-Arlington.

Meanwhile, the Wildcats' women's team, ranked No. 35, faces No. 9 Iowa State and No. 18 Wisconsin. Both teams swept the field at last week's Wildcat Invita-

Shalee Lehning continuing K-State legacy, this time as coach

Mark Kern

As Alexander Graham Bell once said, "When one door closes, another opens; but we often look so long and so regretfully upon the closed door that we do not see the one which has opened for us." That might be true for some, but definitely not Shalee Lehning, assistant coach for K-State's women's basketball team and former player.

After graduating from K-State, setting several university and Big 12 Conference records and seeing her jersey hung in the rafters, it was on to the WNBA to continue her career.

Drafted 25th by the Atlanta Dream in 2009, Lehning was able to join a team that was ready to contend for championships. In her rookie season, Lehning started 20 out of 34 games and led the Dream with 3.7 assists per game.

Her first off-season was a big one — on Jan. 26, 2010, she was added to the K-State coaching staff. K-State head coach Deb Patterson said getting Lehning was a must for her team.

"Anytime you can add someone like Lehning to your staff, you do it," Patterson said. "Everything she accomplished here as a player — she epitomizes our program. She can still play a little bit as well, so she gives our players a challenge in practice, besides her knowledge of the game."

After her stellar rookie season, the Atlanta Dream felt that Lehning was a key member of the team and decided to vote her a co-captain. Dream head coach Fred Williams, who was an assistant at the time, said the team made the right call.

"Being a captain is more than just the way you play on the court," Williams said. "She was very good on the court, but her personality off was equally as impressive. Shalee is one of those people that you just flock to and want to hang out with. On road trips or in spare time, she was always drawing a crowd. You just want to hang out with

Lehning proved the team right, starting all 33 games. She once again lead the team with 4.8 assists and helped guide the

Abstinence-only programs should cover masturbation

I was debating with a friend recently on the subject of sex education in schools. I believe that educating kids about sex thoroughly and early enough (i.e. before they start getting knocked up) is very important. My friend believes in abstinence-only education and does not believe in sex before marriage. As you can imagine, this can make for some very interesting and sometimes heated debates, but my friend is a very eloquent speaker and presented an opposing argument very well. To my friend's surprise, I conceded sort of. I agreed with my friend that abstinence-only education programs could work, but only if students are educated about masturbation. My friend acted more appalled at the idea of masturbation than at the idea of premarital sex. I was not surprised. Despite the fact that we live in a highly sexual nation, where sex ideas and images are bombarding us on TV and other forms of media all the time, we still have very strange ideas about sex. The fact that we should be ashamed of our own bodies is presented to us in many different forms, and I find this idea preposterous.

I saw an episode of "Top Gear" on BBC that had Patrick Stewart as the guest, and he told a charming story about his first time in a Jaguar that involved a very lucky lady and some "heavy petting." This is a term that is familiar to people my parents' age, but is not really used anymore.

For those of you who don't know, heavy petting is basically mutual masturbation. It involves everything except the actual act of intercourse. This seems to have fallen out of style in recent years. We seem to have the idea that intercourse is the only real option we have. Again, I think this is preposterous Whether you're doing it with a partner or solo, masturbation should always be an option and is arguably the best option to satisfy one's natural urges.

Looking at it from strictly a scientific point of view, masturbation should be practiced by everyone because of the health benefits it provides. A Dec. 29, 2011, Men's Health News article cites numerous studies conducted by doctors showing that masturbation helps prevent prostate cancer, regulate hormone levels, reduce stress and even strengthen the immune system.

Women benefit from masturbation, too. According to WebMD, it helps regulate hormone levels and improves mood, just like it does for men. It also helps manage pain, which is beneficial for women who experience cramping during PMS or suffer from chronic migraines.

For those of you who have been told that masturbation ruins your sex life, this is completely untrue. For men, regular masturbation can prevent and alleviate erectile dysfunction and can help them last longer during sex. For women, it can help them understand their bodies and what feels good to them, which may help them enjoy themselves more when they are with a partner.

What are the negative effects of masturbation on your health? There are none. From a scientific point of view, you'd be crazy not to masturbate.

Now that we have the scientific aspect out of the way, let's talk about the moral implications of masturbation. My friend argued that masturbation is wrong because the Bible says so. Does it say that? For answers, I turned to another friend of mine, Pastor Jonathan Haney of Manhattan Reformed Presbyterian Fellowship.

Haney said there are no passages in the Bible that specifically say that masturbation is bad or sinful. There are, however, passages that put masturbation into that gray area where it could potentially be immoral, specifically Matthew 5:27-28: "You have heard that it was said, 'YOU SHALL NOT COMMIT ADULTERY' but I say to you that everyone who looks at a woman with lust for her has already committed adultery with her in his heart."

This confused me a little, because by definition "adultery" is where one or both of the parties involved is married. If someone is unmarried and the source of his or her sexual fantasy is unmarried, this is technically not "adultery." Haney agreed that this is technically correct, but added, "Jesus says the lustful thought still breaks the commandment — we are not proved innocent of sin based upon loopholes."

Haney also pointed out that the health benefits of masturbation can also be achieved through a healthy marriage and referred me to I Corinthians 7:9, which states, "If they do not have self-control, let them marry; for it is better to marry than to burn with passion."

Those of you who argue for abstinence-only education are likely doing so because of your religious beliefs. While the Bible does argue that adultery and lust are bad things, it does not specifically say that touching yourself is bad: the intentions behind the act are what matter.

I would argue that masturbation is still the best option for those who wish to save themselves for marriage and promote abstinence-only education in schools. As someone who unashamedly practices masturbation, I would also point out that sex — whether it's by yourself or with a partner — is all in the mind. You don't necessarily have to fantasize about anything or anybody in particular to achieve orgasm. The Bible has absolutely nothing to say about that.

I still believe educating kids about sex thoroughly and at a young age is of the utmost importance, but there are other options and it is important that whatever your stance is on the subject, you keep an open mind to all options available. Frankly, whether or not a school chooses to promote safer sex or promote abstinence, I believe masturbation should be a subject on which everyone should be educated. Your body is nothing to be ashamed of.

Sarah Palin not 'bashed' at Golden Globes; public figures fair game

Awards shows are a popular arena for comedians to unleash their witty jabs at public figures with little consequence. Celebrities expect to get made fun of at an awards show. They are often seen smiling and waving during the joke, taking it all fairly gracefully.

I have seen very few celebrities who are willing to throw a fit over an award show comedy routine. Unfortunately, there will always be people who get angry over some innocent quip, and for the 2013 Golden Globes, those people were conservative politicians.

The HBO mini-series "Game Change" won three awards at the Golden Globes and portrays the selection of then-Alaska governor Sarah Palin as John McCain's running mate for the 2008 election. Both Julianne Moore and director Jay Roach made negative comments about Palin in their acceptance speeches, which has left the conservative media in a frenzy. There are complaints, not only about the film winning so many awards just because it supports a liberal agenda, but also about the alleged bullying of Palin during the awards show.

These allegations made by conservatives against the Golden Globes and its participants are just another sad excuse to yell about how mean the liberals are to conservative politicians. The term used by Rush Limbaugh was "bash," as if Moore and Roach had openly been insulting Palin in their speeches. All that I heard was Moore thanking Tina Fey and Katie Couric for their coverage

Roach only made a simple statement of his opinion on Palin's participation. They expressed their own political affiliations simply and quickly. Neither party focused on Palin for more than a sentence, and for good reason, as they were thanking the people who helped them win

noir awarde

The conservatives who cry that Palin is being bullied because there is no one to defend her at the Globes are ridiculous. Sarah Palin has chosen to live within the public eye for many years now, and I don't see why she deserves special treatment over other politicians and celebrities.

I heard celebrities Meryl Streep, James Cameron and Quentin Tarantino all get insulted within the first couple of minutes of Amy Poehler and Tina Fey's opening monologue, and no one seems to be upset that they were being bullied. It is widely accepted that celebrities are allowed to be called out by comedians, so why are they getting so upset by Sarah Palin in particular?

Perhaps it is because she is a politician and not simply a celebrity, but the outrage still confuses me. Aren't both liberal and conservative politicians called out and often made fun of by the opposing party's media every day? I recall the very conservative politicians who are pointing out this injustice using the same techniques that Moore and Roach used to criticize President Obama and other liberal politicians.

Is it also necessary to behave as if the Hollywood Foreign Press Association only gave the series awards because it supports a liberal agenda? Surely, if they wanted to make that point, they could have given it one award. I think it isn't too hard to consider that the series might actually be good after winning a total of three awards, two of which were for acting. Perhaps if a movie came out with conservative leanings and won awards for being well-made, the GOP wouldn't be in such a frenzy for blood.

A final argument against the bashing could be made for preserving Palin's human dignity. Of course she is a human and deserves to be treated with respect, but sadly we cannot make everyone in the world refrain from putting one another down. When you are a celebrity, you are expected to deal with comedic comments often. If Palin's political party can't do so, perhaps they aren't suited to the public positions they occupy.

Pinterest: more than a way to waste time, plan weddings

It has been called "electronic hoarding" and the "most creative way to waste time on the computer." It helps people around the world find and share innovative ideas and sometimes provides a much-needed giggle or motivational boost.

But what's the real deal with the hype surrounding the Internet site Pinterest? Is it beneficial in any way, or is it truly just a more creative means of killing time?

Although the Pinterest website has been online for about three years, its current level of popularity seems to be a fairly recent phenomenon. With the site's growth in popularity has come a sense of camaraderie between pinners everywhere.

Gone are the days of keeping one's best decorating, crafting and cooking techniques a secret. With this collaborative website, all knowledge is common knowledge, making it nearly impossible to mention even a semi-creative idea without someone immediately chiming in with, "Oh, I saw that on Pinterest!'

Despite the site's time-wasting potential, many users believe that Pinterest has perks when it comes to organizing and managing handy tips and tricks or even finding inspiration

With Pinterest, users can create their own categories, such as style, recipes or humor, and save photos and websites to these respective "boards." This ensures that all desired information has its own place and can be easily tracked down for future reference.

As with every technological fad, Pinterest has developed a few interesting trends of its own. Perhaps one of the best-known stereotypes attached to the site is that many users are women who utilize Pinterest as an electronic wedding planner. Many Pinterest users dedicate their boards to the dreamiest dresses, color schemes and decor inspiration, and the site even has its own wedding database that users can search exclusively for the perfect pins to help their special day come to life.

But here's the catch: while some of these individuals are indeed planning to exchange vows, many aren't even engaged yet. This has sparked a realm of interest about the concept. Why have a wedding board if you're not even certain you'll ever have a wedding?

K-State alum Shelby Staab admitted that she does, in fact, have her own pre-engagement wedding board. Staab said she feels that as a group, women in particular receive undue flack for having these collec-

'Yes, I will admit that I have one, and no, I am nowhere near ready for marriage," Staab said. "But I also have a board full of home design ideas and building plans and I don't own a house."

For Staab, Pinterst is simply putting age-old practices out in the open and in one spot on the Internet.
"The whole point of Pinterest is that they took the existing idea of a social bookmarking site, and focused heavily on imagery, making it the perfect place to store all of your inspiration," Staab said. "Single women have been flipping through wedding magazines and browsing wedding sites for forever now. Pinterest has just made it easier to organize your ideas so when you are ready, you'll have a much simpler time planning."

With all the wedding board excitement it would appear that Pinterest appeals largely to the female population. However, men seem to be jumping aboard the Pinterest bandwagon. According to the Huffington Post, in 2012 slightly more than 30 percent of Pinterest users were male. Eric Conner, junior in regional and community planning, said that he's no stranger to the Pinterest epidemic.

"I've had an account for about a year now," Conner said. "Everyone was shocked when I would log on to Pinterest at work, but now, it seems more normal for guys to have one." But what are men looking for

Though it might not seem like it at first glance, Pinterest has uses beyond planning weddings, including organizing recipes and collecting ideas for projects or work. "Everyone was shocked when I would log on to Pinterest at work, but now, it seems more normal for guys to have one."

On Saturday, three other athletic programs join the track and field team on the schedule. First up is the women's tennis team, which travels to Boston to battle two first-time opponents in their season opener, No. 74 Harvard and the College of William &

Also in action Saturday are the men's and women's basketball teams. The women's team travels to Austin to take on the University of Texas. The Wildcats (12-7, 3-4 Big 12) have been depleted by injuries, with sophomore guard Áshia Woods and junior forward Ashlynn Knoll out for the season, leaving the team with only seven active players. Nevertheless, K-State won in overtime against No. 12 Oklahoma State 76-70 on Wednesday.

The women's basketball team plays Texas at 1 p.m. on Saturday. The game will be broadcast on KMAN-AM 1350.

The men's team travels to Ames, Iowa, to take on the Iowa State Cyclones on Saturday. Head coach Bruce Weber and his team will look to bounce back after a tough home loss to in-state rival Kansas on Tuesday night.

The Wildcats currently have a record of 15-3 (4-1 in conference play) and are currently tied for second place in the conference, only one game behind the Jayhawks. Their game against Iowa State tips off at 12:30 p.m. Fans can listen to the game at KM-house, just in case I make a bunch of money and can build one," Conner said. "I have to be prepared."

"Thave to be prepared."

Conner said he also has boards for clothing and style because he likes to see what women think looks good, saying it gives him a leg up. He has even pinned a few crafty ideas for home decor.

Despite all of the fun ideas that Pinterest has to offer, it can also offer career planning advice — maintaining it does have a utilitarian value aside from photos of Zac Efron and cake frosting techniques.

Leah Oropesa, junior in secondary education, said that she recently started using the site as a way to locate and save ideas to help her in the classroom post-graduation.

"As an education major, Pinterest has been great to help me find ideas for lesson planning, activities or tutorials," Oropesa said. "I'm currently using it to give me ideas on how to decorate my future classroom and how to creatively teach lessons in a way that will engage my students."

Regardless of individual interests, Pinterest appears to have something to offer everyone. Whether you're looking to take up a new hobby, add some spice to your rental house or just need an idea for dinner tonight, this site is a sure-fire way to find the "Pinspiration" needed to make it happen.

no longer limited to designers at Cosmo or Sports Illustrated. Glossi.com allows users to easily design digital magazines on any topic, like fashion, how-to guides, catalogs or recipes. Templates help guide users with easy-to-use, sharp-looking designs. Users can upload PDFs, type directly into the template and upload photos and videos. Glossi magazines can be published through major social networks and embedded onto sites and blogs.

4. Wordle

Wordle allows users to create custom word clouds to liven up a presentation or project. Users can insert text or a link to a website and the program automatically creates a unique word cloud. The colors, fonts and layouts can be modified to create a custom look. It's free, and it doesn't even require a login, making it fast and easy to use. Users can then share or print their completed wordles. According to the website, you can "put it on your book cover, your T-shirt, your campaign poster, what have you. You may get rich off it."

5. Study Blue

studyblue.com
Study Blue allows users to make digital flash cards accessible from many devices, including the iPad, iPod, iPhone and Android devices. As the website says, "Study on the bus or in line for a taco. Free mobile apps mean instant access to every note or flashcard you need. If you've got two minutes, you've got time to review your study materials." Users can share their flashcards with classmates or upload notes to share. Forget to study? Set an alarm, and Study Blue will remind you with a text message and a direct link to the study materials.

Move beyond basic presentations and finish your projects in style with these multimedia presentations programs. With so many templates and so much freedom, each platform offers practically endless options for topics, content and end products. Get plugged in, and you no longer have an excuse ("My dog ate my iPhone?") not to ace tests, and to complete projects with flare and ease.

EXPO | Carnival exposes students to new financial program

Carnival attracts many different types of student groups and initiatives. One of the carnival's attractions was the "money vault" — a yellow, blown-up, house-like structure set up on the main floor of the Union. Students got the chance to enter and grab cash blowing around in the vault; whatever they held on to, they could keep.

"We have the money vault here," said Jodi Kaus, director of Powercat Financial Counseling. "The way students have the opportunity to enter the money vault is to check out our new program, SALT."

SALT, a new, free online program offered through PFC, offers students financial help in multiple areas relating to college. SALT helps students manage student loans, talk to experts about loans, seek jobs and internships, search for scholarships and find out how to learn about credit and managing money. Kaus said the program attracted a lot of attention from students.

"I think this tabling has been going great," she said. "There has been a steady stream of students who have come and checked out our new program, as well as entered the money vault."

Student organizations also got the opportunity to be a part of the Winter Activities Carnival. Taylor Middleton, president of the K-State chapter of Habitat for Humanity and sophomore in marketing, ran a booth at the expo and said she thought the carnival went well.

"There were constantly people stopping by our table to talk to us," Middleton said. "This is incredibly beneficial for us since we just started up last year. This type of event allows us to get out name out there and allows students to know there are different outlets to receive community service hours and volunteerism. We like events like this, to find new people to join, due to our organization running purely off of volunteers."

Tommy Theis | Collegian

Airbrush tattooing was one activity available to students at the Winter Expo and Activities Carnival. Dalton Schnieders, freshman in mechanical engineering, got a tribal tattoo with some of his friends that evening at the tattoo station outside of Salsarita's in the K-State Studen Union Courtyard on Thursday evening.

COACH | Lehning forced to quit Dream after injury

Dream to an Eastern Conference championship before falling in the WNBA finals. Lehning said it was a true honor to be named a captain in only her second season.

"It was awesome to be named captain, it was an honor," Lehning said. "I am more of a leader in the fact that I lead by example. I go out and do my job the way I know how to and make sure that I am doing everything in my power to help the team. It showed the team had faith in me."

On July 3, 2011, Lehning tore her ACL in a game against the Connecticut Sun, ending her season and landing her in surgery to repair the injury. On Jan. 31, 2012, complications from the surgery forced Lehning to make the decision to retire from the game she loved, a decision that she said was the hardest of her life.

"It was by far the toughest decision that I have ever had to make," Lehning said. "Basketball is the sport that I absolutely love, but God had a plan for me and I followed it. I still get to practice against the team all the time, so it is not like I have hung up the shoes. It was hard at first, but I love coaching and it is my

According to Williams, Lehning's passion for the game of basketball as a player will drive her to succeed as a coach.

"Shalee truly loves the game of basketball," Williams said. "Whether it was playing or just talking basketball, it is her life. I have absolutely no doubt that she will continue to improve as a coach and become an outstanding coach in the future. She just loves basketball too much not to succeed."

Lehning's career path has taken a few unexpected turns, but rather than let the injury define her, she took the challenge head-on. Lehning is now an instrumental part of the K-State women's basketball team — for a second time.
